

ABSTRACT

Empirical research on the political budget cycle is very broad. However, the majority focused on the case of developed countries. Just recently, the experience of developing countries taken. The use of the state budget for the upcoming elections can be seen from several cases that had come before, such as the case of the use of voucher education funds committed by the members of the House of Representatives to each electoral district.

This study tries to learn of the existence of political budget cycles. The dependent variable in this research that domestic revenues, while an election year, central government spending, subsidies, social funds, and the withdrawal of foreign loans as a free variable. Data analysis using descriptive and trend analysis tools. This is because previous data has an influence on decision-making data in the following year.

Of the five proposed hypothesis can be concluded that there is a trend towards the upside momentum budget politics (elections). The budget is allegedly for the benefit petahana be elected again.

Keywords: domestic revenues, an election year, central government spending, subsidies, social funds, and the withdrawal of foreign loan