

ABSTRACT

This study aims to determine the development and phenomena of corporate social responsibility research related to corporate governance. This study uses a systematic literature review method on 120 corporate social responsibility research articles related to corporate governance obtained from Emerald and Scopus during 2000 - 2018 with certain criteria and filters. In this study, it was found that during 2000 - 2018 research on corporate social responsibility related to corporate governance still had implications only for constituents of shareholders (investors) and had not shown clear implications for non-shareholder consistency. Reputation and legitimacy are still the dominant driving factors for companies in carrying out social responsibility disclosures. If it is related to the development of the concept of corporate social responsibility from year to year, it seems that the phenomenon of the research on corporate social responsibility related to corporate governance is similar to what Milton Friedman and neo-classical supporters put forward as a 'shareholder model' which assumes that companies do not have responsibility to society as a whole and only focus on the welfare of its shareholders. In addition, this research phenomenon appears to be in accordance with the model proposed by Jamali et al. (2008) which states that corporate governance acts as a pillar of corporate social responsibility, where the interpretation of this model focuses on the creation of corporate value which is one of the things considered by shareholders in making decisions. It was also found that there was integration (merger) and alternation (exchange) in the roles and functions of corporate social responsibility and corporate governance in research during 2000 - 2018.
